The Weird Indian Dance.

In an Indian dance the performers are usually arranged in a single or double row or in small groups, and either maintain their positions throughout or vary it by moving slowly around in a circle. The particular movement by which this is accomplished is an alternate stamping of the feet or prancing, which not even the most enthusiastic admirer of things Indian would call graceful. The movement is also invariably accompanied and timed by a chant, sometimes weird, but always monotonous, and the music which often lends its aid is evolved from a drum or by rubbing one stick over another in which notches have been cut, or more commonly by what boys call a "bull roarer," an instrument consisting of a which a string is attached. By rapidly whirling the wood about the head a loud purring or subdued roaring is produced. This is supposed to have a powerful influence in exorcising evil spirits or in netifying good spirits that attention is desired. In addition to these in- | Fun. struments the ratcle is very much in evidence in many dances, and is an important part of the paraphernalia. Rattles are often made of shells of gourds, partly filled with pebbles, sometimes of a frame or circlet of wood about half an inch deep, covered with tightly stretched skin and mounted on a suitable handle. In many of the dances additional rattles are used, consisting of turtle shells bound on the legs of the dancers at the knee, and having attached to them a bunch of deer or sheep hoofs, which give out a rhythmical clank as the performers stamp in uni-

Captain Dave, of the Piute tribe of Indians, is a character in his way, and has achieved considerable reputation as a wit. Civilization has done much for Captain Dave; among other things It has taught him the Yankee way of replying to one question by asking another. This is well illustrated in the story which the Evening Chronicle of Virginia City, Nevada, tells:

Some white men were joking Captain Dave the other day about his claim that he could tell all the various tribes of Indians. But as usual, when one attempts to get ahead of Captain Dave, they came out second best. One question put to him was as follows: "Captain Dave, doesn't Shoshone
